Borrowing By THE GENTLEWOMAN

American who died recently, and who

American who died recently, and who enjoined his daughter in his wiil "to lend no money to others nor endorse for others. Rather give what you can afford," he advises, "and let it go at that." More than one great man has held the same views. Shakespear's dictum on the subject is well known and Ruskin held very strong opinions. "Starve and go to heaven, but don't berrow," he said. In our own time. George Hernard Shaw said. "Imagine being married to a borrower," as if no worse fate could me conceived.

It may perchance be that none of these sentlemen was ever in their extremity, that they had never been reduced to their last farthing. On the other hand, it is more probable that by "borrower," they mean the habitual anexer of other people's money, the individual who, though unable to dig, and ashamed to beg, is never backward in borrowing, while payment never enters into his calculations.

The borrower is born, not made. He knows, by some subtle intuition, when he has the time and, the place and the leader alt together. The unsophisticated borrower never knows. He approaches people when they are in bad temper or in an impoverished condition, or when they are engaged in interesting conversation. As a consequence, he is hardly ever successful. The astute borrower, having fifst put the prospective lender in a good temper by wiles known only to those whom practice has made perfect, ascertains astutely that his victim has in his possession the sum desired, then descends upon him suddenly, metaphorically pinions him to the spot, leaving no loopholes for excuses or denials. Of course, there are less direct ways of borrowing than this. Generally speaking women adont more round-shout methods than men, and they are more addicted to borrowing "unconsidered criffes"—pencils, pen-knives, hatpins, and little things which they "cannot be bothered" buying for themselves. Charles Lamb detested the book borrower, perhaps because of all the specials he is least likely to return the loan. The loss of a book that one has treasured for loan "often loseth both itself and friends." friends"

However, borrowing and lending are not to be condemned on all occasions. There are times when a loan of money may save a soul from despair; when it may tide an unfortunate person over a critical period. This is a very different matter to lending money to the habitual borrower, who is thereby encouraged to be idle and careless, and whose self-respect diminishes with each loan youch safed to him.
